But the size of the application also blocks the way. I am mentioning the full size of the application since it is the first thing you see after installation. There are about 10 options on how to organize the interface. There is the standard view, which means a single library of images sorted by date. It's a bit more polished than in the previous version, and I like it. There are several other options, but most of them are rather esoteric. I believe that Adobe could have made better use of Dynamic sub-pane arrangements, such as 'All images' grouped by various parts of the image, 'Basic adjustments' grouped by the main function it performs, 'Filters' grouped by filter categories, etc. Some of the sub-pane types are available, but only half of the functions are accessible in each of them. It is also a bit strange that you can't sort photos by other metadata as well as by date. And here is another point. While the new interface is more stable, I think that in certain cases you will see a tab disappearing or some shift in the size of the interface. For example, if you try to export a big image, or attach an image to a comments, your shelves will unnecessarily expand. I believe that Adobe needs to sort this out by making the interface more stable and correcting other bugs. It seems like Adobe has a new approach in handling RAW files. Certainly, Lightroom deserves all the praise it gets, and it is a very useful tool. But Truth be told, Lightroom does not have a good name for RAW processing. It is still the highly underrated program that is too slow and too complex. It is also not the perfect all-round tool, because it lacks RAW editing features and PhotoStudio, which are still missing. Luckily, Lightroom 5 expands the original program by admitting the importance of such an all-important tool category. Our efforts are now focused on making its RAW editing workflow even more flexible. Adobe has worked hard on cleaning up the interface and refined Lightroom's performance.
