The share format is to provide a very small set of data for selective feedback - just enough for quick and effective feedback. The file contains the project name, a comment on the file and the DoP's username. It also includes a link to the full resolution version of the image so that the DoP can take it when desired. The comment can be a short description of the file, comments from the shoot, or a note from the client listing any relevant instructions for the DoP. This feedback does not include any branding or other elements that are needed by the client, as this is not provided to the client. The DoP can choose to either leave it on the web platform, which keeps it open to sharing with folks, or save it locally, which keeps it closed to the public. Sharing with clients through Lightroom CC is easy and flexible. To save a client review, first select the "Share with Client" tool when you are managing your shoots. In the dialog that follows, select the folder in which the post-processing work will be stored and the appropriate file types. Files will be put into the "Available for Viewing by Clients" or "Available for Editing" groups. This will quickly save the project for all clients to see. To save the file for Edit Only access, choose "Save in Edit Only Folder" and then select the "Edit Files" folder. The client will be given the ability to edit, crop, and apply adjusting effects. A number of caveats should be noted, however. Canon's tilt & shift allows for a beautiful 'crow's foot' effect to photograph yourself. It's a photo that can be used to show off one's waggly whites. This is a great effect, and pausing your self-portrait isn't always an option.
