On November 25th, 2008, the FBI searched the apartment and hotel room of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Yemeni national who served as Osama bin Laden's driver and bodyguard. That raid produced the largest habeas corpus petition ever filed in the United States. Hamdan's case was overseen by federal magistrate judge Virginia Seitz, who refused the government's original motion to dismiss the petition. The Justice Department sought to appeal that ruling. To date, I've spent a lot of time with Salim. I had the privilege of teaching a class on counterterrorism at Yale University, and I decided to use his case as a class assignment. Students wrote motions to dismiss the habeas corpus petition filed by Hamdan's attorneys, urging Judge Seitz to throw out the petition. We argued about whether habeas corpus is a "civil" remedy or a "criminal" remedy. We talked about the differences between domestic and international law. We discussed the legality of the President's power to order the military to detain a foreign national. We grappled with the definition of "unlawful enemy combatant"—and whether the administration had appropriately defined that term. On September 29th, in a decision that was greeted with cheers, Judge Seitz rejected the government's motion to dismiss the habeas corpus petition and ordered the military to release Hamdan. The administration then appealed the decision, asking the Court of Appeals to throw out the case, or at least to remand it back to the trial court for additional fact-finding. While the appellate court did not reverse the lower court's decision, it ordered the judge to reconsider whether she should have issued an injunction against the government. On
