In this photo illustration, I've combined elements from several other Photoshop Elements images, cropped, entered layer masks and recolored using the Hue/Saturation tool, then adjusted contrast and brightness. I've combined elements from different Photoshop files and layered them using Move and Repeat masks. I've used on-canvas adjustment layers that I created and saved, armed with the Properties palette, and have created version and layer folders to help me organize images, brush strokes and layers. The stock iOS stock photo library, which would be replaced by an app, has thrived in my experience, and it's easy to access from within the stock app, as well as from within Photoshop Elements with the Access iPhone app . I create a Vector Mask layer that uses the Transform effect (it's easiest to use the Transform effect than the Move Tool) to move and rotate the boat in the background. Because I'm previewing this image in Photoshop Elements and it's the same one I'll use in the advertisement, I've enhanced the lighting in the photo. I create a new Adjustment layer and use the Curves and Curves adjustments to enhance the boat and add dimension. I duplicate the layer for the second boat, offset it horizontally and vertical. That way I can easily change the angle of one boat, and I'm not having to painstakingly redo the same steps. In the first step, I create a new canvas, then add a blue background by using the Canvas Background option on the New Layer menu. Next, it's time to create a new empty layer. Because I want to utilize a stock graphic image that I've previously edited in Elements, I load the image from the Pixelmator stock library into the Export PSB palette.
