Flash, the omnibus term for those multipurpose Flash only plugins in modern browsers, is full of possibilities. You can use it to include objects, animation, video, audio, and even interactivity. It can especially be used to create games, business presentations, video presentations, animations, cartoons, and slideshows. While it is an initial matter of making applications but Flash is nowhere near the position Photoshop is right now. It has a significant drawback as well, though. In addition to being slow and a bit buggy, it requires a separate download and install, something that is not convenient on a regular basis. These days, it's not much of a problem, since Flash-only websites are rare and websites that offer Flash alternatives are becoming increasingly common. On the other hand, the lack of Adobe Flash integration somehow reminds me of the lack of support for Fujifilm X-Trans RAW files. Ignoring the fact that Lightroom does a great job working with X-Trans RAW files, it's still only a matter of time before Adobe added its own converter. Despite all of this, Flash is still worth a look. Finally, I would like to note that Facebook integration within Lightroom has been removed. As you may know, your images can be viewed, edited, and shared on Facebook by using the Facebook File System, which is quite convenient. But according to the Facebook Support page, Facebook added a small business service called "Shared Stories" in May of 2016, which is supposed to make Facebook integration easier. Lightroom will now automatically include Shared Stories album and event posts when you share images on Facebook. However, the removal of the Facebook integration in the original Lightroom is now causing a bit of dissatisfaction, even if it's only because it provides a sense of nostalgia. But at any rate, it's nice that people will be more happy doing Facebook things with your images instead of on it. Only time will tell whether the integration gains more popularity.
